Peopling the New World: Immigration and Migration

Immigration

Beginning with the first Native Americans to come across the land bridge that existed at the end of the last ice age people have been migrating into that portion of North America that is now the United States.

Immigration has played an important part in the development of the United States. Unfortunately, every new group of immigrants has faced problems upon their arrival. Partially depending upon what part of the world the immigrants come from and partially upon the economic and political climate at the time of their arrival some groups receive a warmer welcome than others. During the decades between 1840 and 1860 millions of immigrants came to the United States looking for jobs in the new industries that were developing in the Northeastern United States. The largest of these immigrant groups during this time period were the Irish. By 1860 there were over 1.5 million Irish immigrants in the Northeast United States.
